

Do you ever feel anxious when you're around other people, or if you might have to be the center of attention? Do you worry that other people will notice something about you – or how you behave – and judge you for it?

Social anxiety is the name for feeling these kinds of fears in social situations. Psychologists think that between 2 and 7 people out of every 100 experience significant social anxiety every year.

The core of social anxiety: your self-impression

We all have an impression in our minds of how we come across to other people. This is your self-image or self-impression. If you have social anxiety, you are likely to hold an impression of yourself that is very negative. As a result, you may worry that other people will think negatively of you as well. Put into words, your self-impression might sound like:

Your negative self-impression can get stuck in place for a few reasons:

Self-focused attention

If you pay attention to how you think you are coming across to other people, you might focus your attention inwards – towards your own body feelings, thoughts, feelings, and judgements about your performance.

Self-consciousness is the opposite of a performance enhancer (ask any sportsperson). Worse, it gives you a biased impression of how you are really coming across to people.

Unhelpful thinking

Negative automatic thoughts that people with social anxiety have in social situations include:

- Predictions: "They will think I look anxious."
- Worries: "What if I say something and nobody replies?"
- Judgements: "I'm making such a mess of this."
- Doubts: "I'll never be able to do this.

Avoidance and safety behaviors

Do you ever avoid situations that make you feel anxious? Or do you do things to control how you come across to other people?

Avoidance and safety behaviors are well-intended, but they can lead to a lot of problems:

- They prevent you from learning the truth.
- They heighten your self-focus.
- They sometimes lead to the result that you were trying to prevent.
- They can make you appear unfriendly or uninterested.

Treatment for social anxiety

The psychological treatment for social anxiety which has the strongest research support is individual (one to one) cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT) specifically designed for social anxiety. This is sometimes called cognitive therapy for SAD, or CT-SAD. Medications for social anxiety disorder are typically recommended as a second-line treatment if you don't want to try CBT, or if you haven't found CBT helpful.

PSYCHOLOGYT@#LS®